SUTRO COLLECTION ON VIEW.

Paintings by Seven of Moran Fam ily Are Feature.

Canvases and water colors by American painters of the older schools and from the private collection of Theodore Sutro are on exhibition in the Graham Galleries prior to their sale at auction next Thursday and Friday evenings.

Mr. Sutro is a great admirer of the Moran family of painters, and among pictures by seven members of the family represented in the collection is a grandlose "Glimpse of Helgoland," painted in the days before that again became a menace to Great Britain, by Thomas S. Moran; one of Edward Moran's French peasant figures called "Noonday Rest"; another typical French canvas, painted by Leon Moran, entitled "Strolling Acrobats," and a study of a woman's head in pure water color by Annette Moran. Sutro are on exhibition in the Grahan by Annette Moran. Asher B. Durand is represented by a characteristic wood interior: the veteran George H. Story by a genre painting, "The Wenning Hand"; De Cost at Lee Van Ching Dispersal.

of the war, writes Ian Hay in "A Welcome to All American Soldiers and Sallors," the very first British troops on arriving in France were rushed to the front in a fleet of London motor buses.
The leading bus bore upon its front in bold letters a legend which would have een more intelligible to Americans than Frenchmen. It was "Potash and Perl-mutter. Every evening at 8."

The Parisians, under a natural misapprehension, threw their caps into the air and cried: "Hurrah for Gen. Potash! Hurrah for Gen. Perimutter!"
